ABSTRACT

The publication of this bibliography is part of the ongoing effort of the Michigan History Division to make historical resources within the state more readily available. This bibliography cites various unpublished source materials relating to women which are available in a number of archives in Michigan. Representative collections relating to all areas of women's history are included to make the document of the greatest potential use to researchers in women's studies. This listing of widely varying materials is designed not only to aid researchers but to contribute toward a better understanding of woman's role in society. (SJL)

Preface

The publication of this bibliography is part of the ongoing effort of the Michigan Department of State through its Michigan History Division to make historical resources within the state more readily available. Finding aids, such as this one on sources related to women, while not glamorous, are crucial first steps which make possible exciting and valuable articles and books.

A bibliography that will aid researchers in women's history is particularly appropriate at this time. In the last several years women's history has attracted the interest of a growing number of historians and researchers in other fields. Hopefully, this volume will help maintain and nourish that interest. Furthermore, the increased study of women's history has already had its impact on the Bicentennial. Clearly, the Bicentennial celebration of the American Revolution will include significant mention of women and other groups who have been neglected in the past. The Michigan History Division hopes that this bibliography will aid those Bicentennial projects that plan to highlight the role of women in history.

Finally, we hope this volume will clearly illustrate that Michigan has a number of fine archives that contain materials too long neglected. Ultimately, the purpose of this volume is to make those repositories more well-known and useful.

Martha M. Bigelow, Director
Michigan History Division

Introduction

This cooperative finding aid does not presume to list all unpublished collections pertaining to women in the State of Michigan. The institutions chose to publish information only on the most representative collections — those which each cooperating institution felt to be of the greatest potential use to researchers in women's studies. At the out-set of the project the question arose whether to list only materials directly related to women's causes, i.e. suffrage organizations, women's rights groups, and so on. However, a more catholic interpretation prevailed, that collections related to women regardless of their direct relation to the "women's question" should be listed. Clearly, a researcher might be as interested in the diaries of a Michigan farm wife during the great depression or of a black woman active in the struggle for racial freedom as in specific women's causes. In other words, this list was designed to help researchers in all areas of women's history. Hopefully, it will be a small step toward a better understanding of woman's role in society.

Archivists are concerned that finding aids have consistency of format and style. Such uniformity has been difficult to achieve in this volume as each cooperating institution catalogs their materials differently and keeps varying information on their collections. For example, some archives classify their materials by cubic feet, some by linear footage and still others by the number of items in a collection. Varying types of materials are also described here. Many personal manuscript collections are listed; one will also find the records of women's organizations, or archival collections of government agencies which directly effect women. The compiler hopes that the reader will understand that the listing of widely varying materials is essential in an effort such as this and that consistency of style though implemented to the fullest possible extent must be secondary to a wide listing of materials.

The compiler would like to thank Valerie Browne of Wayne State University, Wayne Mann of Western Michigan University, Joe Oldenberg of the Burton Historical Collections, Bill Miles of Central Michigan University, Mary Jo Pugh of the University of Michigan and Kathy Roe of the State Archives for preparing the listings from their repositories for this Guide.
